I have a list of files which are processed by a bash script for test. The list of files are about 100 items. I find that the time it costs is about 30 seconds. Why is it so slow? for file in `ls` do if [[-x $file]] then if [$file -nt $(stat -f '%z' "$file") -a $file -nt $(ls -t "$file" | tail -n 1) -a -nt $(ls -t "$file" | head -n 1)] then echo "$file is good" fi else echo "$file is bad" fi done A: If ls takes a long time, there's a good chance it's not going to do that properly, so you should use ls -l. -t is like -ls --preserve-times and this won't process symlinks. tail -n 1 won't work if the file is a symlink. /proc/stat may be easier to understand. ls -l files | grep "^r" | grep -v timestamp will give you a list of files that match the globstar *, minus the last character (r). and the output of stat can be piped to xargs to run stat on each file: ls -l files
