Hack with GUIs! Download Speed Reset to Definite!Cell type-specific effects of aminoglutethimide on basal and recombinant growth hormone stimulated prolactin secretion in the ovariectomized rat. Morphological and physiological characteristics of rat prolactin (PRL)-secreting cells are similar to those of human PRL-secreting cells. Also, it has been suggested that PRL-producing cells of the rat are morphologically and functionally similar to lactotrophs of the human. In this study, we used rat pituitary monolayer cultures to examine the effects of the aromatase inhibitor, aminoglutethimide (AG), on basal PRL secretion and the PRL response to recombinant human growth hormone (rhGH). AG (25 microM) increased PRL release by up to 50% in 6-day old rat pituitaries maintained in phenol-red free medium containing 1% fetal bovine serum. AG had a greater stimulatory effect on the PRL release of pituitaries of 19-day old rats as compared to the 6-day old rat pituitaries. This suggests that aging may influence the ability of AG to stimulate PRL release. AG had no effect on PRL release of rat pituitaries cultured for 6 days in the presence of 100 ng/ml rhGH. However, a greater stimulatory effect on PRL release was noted when AG was added concurrently with 100 ng/ml rhGH as compared to rhGH alone. Moreover, the peak PRL response of the pituitaries from the 19-day old rats was 3.8-fold greater than that of the PRL release of the 6-day
