Along the way, the author has reminded himself a few things about interpersonal psychology. First of all: there are two main kinds of people in the world (if we can talk about two main kinds of people where diversity is concerned, then there are actually a few more, but that's a topic for another time, I guess): chameleon people and ascetics. Chameleon people are what the author's mother used to be, such as his introverted, buttoned-up, quiet girlfriend. The way his girlfriend is, any data or info she provides to him comes at a price: he has to pay her price, as does she, because that is the nature of relationship between ascetics and chameleons. Then there are ascetics, people who live for themselves, who want their personal space and consider having a girlfriend as an interference to their own life. On the other hand, they really only wanna learn, but they are too lazy to do anything about it. The author's father is an ascetic. His mother is a chameleon. The result is a son who sees the world through the eyes of a chameleon and who quite naturally thinks differently than his mother does, due to the fact that he has not achieved his mother's degree in a subject. Chameleons are very compromising. They understand a thing with their heart, but not their head. Ascetics are very careful on how much they can compromise and on how much they are open to lose. Now, if the author's mother were more like his father, she would be willing to trade a little bit of information to her son, because she understood a thing with her heart, as she understood a thing with her heart, and she would not deny her feelings. As a result, she offered her son things that he really wanted, on a price she was willing to pay. This often results in a bad relationship. The author's mother is a chameleon. The author's father is an ascetic. The
