How to resolve the ongoing Microsoft Meltdown/Spectre bug By Matt Bach, Jan 2 2018 11:18AM The ever present warning of a remote code execution bug has now expanded to encompass all PCs, not just those sold on Amazon.com. According to the New York Times, the vulnerability could be exposed through the use of a "value returned to the kernel through an I/O request" that is "valid and trusted." This would allow someone to potentially write code that would be able to leverage all of the cores on a system, potentially leading to some serious problems. Security researchers are working on how to fix the flaw and are encouraging users to avoid the popular Amazon app marketplace until a fix is available. Most mainstream support for Windows ended a long time ago but it would be wise for any serious users of Internet Explorer 11 to turn off the use of Adobe Flash to avoid this issue. Besides, Microsoft's Edge browser has caught up in terms of functionality to IE 11 and it is highly recommended to upgrade your browser. According to security website Softpedia, a new report states that the vulnerability is most likely caused by the memory allocation software on the AMD Ryzen 7 and Ryzen 8 chips used in the servers and desktops. Some people have come forth saying that the Ryzen chips have a corrupted operating system, which could lead to the vulnerability. The websites claimed that the problem is under investigation by AMD and Microsoft. The report did not specify if it was a CPU failure or an operating system failure or both, though it seems to be related to the OS. AMD has not yet responded to the complaints. #include #include #include #include #include "inmem.h" #include "mem2.h" #include "mem3.h" #include "lanes.h" #include "type2arr.h" #include "type3arr d0c515b9f4

Q: Codeigniter: How to use different views for front and admin I have a codeigniter app that needs to have front-end views and admin views. Currently, my site only has the front-end. What is the best way to go about it? I am thinking about creating a main controller that will redirect to one of two different views depending on which URL was entered in the browser (e.g., and This would be a really nice solution, but I fear that this is probably a bit more work than is needed. Can anyone help me with this? Any help is greatly appreciated. A: You should check out the CI Auto Loader Class. This gives you the option to load views based on the current Controller you're executing in. From the docs The Auto Loader Class loads views by converting incoming paths into an array of file locations. This is helpful because it means you can control where views reside in your application just by changing the URL. Note that the Auto-Loader class only loads the
