IWC Big Date Men's Calendar Watch. IWC's Big Date is a bit of a mismatch. The modest Big Date comes in a 38mm steel case—relatively large for a watch—with a thick and heavy-looking case back. It also has no less than seven complications—that is to say, it has a date display, week and day display, chronograph, hand counter, and two alarms, big and little. The finish is a black ceramic coating, probably to help protect the dial from scratches. But in the end, the date looks like it's just a display at eye level. The other seven pieces are ingeniously integrated behind it. At first glance, IWC appears to have embraced the 1977 new-wave trends of "minimalism," "transparency" and "totally unnecessary ornamentation," in which everyone is doing these groovy, democratic "flat" watches which are almost six times the size of the old ones. But this is not a flat watch. The case is thick and heavy, and it conveys a definite sense of its robustness and maturity. On the back of the case is a little partridge icon among a collection of parts of watches from the IWC collection. It is called the "Lo-Tek" technology. There is no connection to the brand name or to watches in general. All IWC watches can be brought in
