However, many devices, which are currently small and light, are not really efficient and they do not provide the performance that users have come to expect. For example, mobile phone cameras often do not provide very high resolution images. In addition, due to their small size, mobile devices are not very physically robust and they are sensitive to mechanical shocks and drops. Accordingly, there is a need for small, light-weight, and rugged mobile devices that provide superior image resolution and are more resistant to mechanical shocks and drops. In addition, there is a need to support more than one electronic component on a single substrate. For example, many modern portable electronic devices contain a camera and a radio frequency (RF) circuit. Each of these components requires a different process and a different device design. Thus, even though these components are already built on the same substrate, they must be independently processed and individually packaged. For the reasons stated above, and for other reasons stated below which will become apparent to those skilled in the art upon reading and understanding the present specification, there is a need in the art for alternative structures and methods for packaging multiple chips on the same substrate. Influence of the branching on the photophysical properties of dipolar-coupled polysiloxanes: aza-9-helix effect. Branched polysiloxanes bearing suitable side groups are a promising class of candidates for the luminescent sensors of biological substrates that are based on the triplet excited state of zinc tetraphenylporphyrin. A moderate difficulty with obtaining such compounds arose from the lack of efficient crystallization techniques, in particular, with regard to the porphyrin moiety
