More particularly, the present invention relates to semiconductor packages having a different thermal interface material and a separate heatsink. One goal of integrated circuit packaging is to decrease the heat generated by the integrated circuit during operation. In addition, the integrated circuit needs to be protected from environmental degradation. Various approaches have been taken to decrease the heat generated by the integrated circuit, including optimizing the thermal-conduction properties of the package. Accordingly, it would be desirable to provide a method for making a semiconductor package having low thermal resistance between an integrated circuit and its heat sink.The present invention relates to an information processing method and apparatus used to display computer-generated images on a display device and, in particular, to a method and apparatus for displaying computer-generated images with improved resolution. The prior art presents several examples of techniques for improving resolution by spreading a single pixel across multiple pixels. U.S. Pat. No. 5,056,566, for example, discloses an image display apparatus that stores an image signal, separates the image signal into image signals corresponding to the luminance level and the chrominance level, and displays the image signal corresponding to the luminance level on a display device, thereby achieving improvement in the resolution of the image displayed on the display device. The image signal that is separated into image signals corresponding to the luminance level and the chrominance level is that of a wobbly image or a cel-shaded image. The present invention is an improvement over the technique disclosed in this patent. Additionally, U.S. Pat. No. 5,012,254 discloses a method for spreading multiple pixels into a single pixel. This patent discloses a technique by which the luminance level of an image signal that is displayed in
