The ad continues: "Mayor Daley claims the city wants to 'keep homes in the hands of the people' — but he sold out Chicago to a Wall Street bank without even consulting the people's elected representatives." When a state law passed last year put zoning and other rules under the control of the state's Department of Financial and Professional Regulation (DFPR), Rep. John Bradley (D-Chicago) and other community leaders protested their intent to use state law to wrest valuable Chicago land from city control for economic development rather than public safety and education. After the Daley administration failed to come up with a valid explanation for the construction of a new Bank of America Tower at the site of a former Malathion plant in the North Lawndale community, it was the City of Chicago's turn to defend the site, and its right to the city's valuable real estate, against legislative interference. But the city never took up the fight. "We stand fast in the position that the city cannot relinquish control of land that will be used for public safety and education," said U.S. Rep. Bradley. "We are going to exercise every legal and procedural remedy to stop the usurpation of public land by this Daley administration. The legislative and court battle is not over." Last year, Bradley and other top Democratic leaders for Chicago and Cook County, supported by the Northside Community Organization, filed suit in the Cook County Circuit Court to stop the transfer of land from the city to the state, to prevent the bank
