The new version of Photoshop is much faster than any previous upgrade. Of course, one would expect performance improvements, at least for photo and image editing. Importing may take a minor hit, as I will explain in more detail below. The real gains occur in “real-time editing” when you select a spot in an image or path, and go to the spot then back. It’s so much faster than any previous version that I find myself editing without looking at menus in at least one or two locations a day. No matter how you slice it, if you are an image-based Photoshop user, you’re going to upgrade to CS6 whether you are a Windows user or a Mac user. It’s easily worth the money, even if you’re an old Photoshop user (and even if you’re an old version user). The newest version of the image editor is still showing periodic performance problems on high-end computers, especially with large libraries. I think that its main downside is the fact that it still lacks the multi-threaded preview system that we see in mainstream apps like “My photos”. This means that even if you buy a powerful desktop computer, Photoshop will perform poorly. That has not changed in the most recent iteration. Personally, I get by with an iPad Pro’s Performance Mode but so far I have not experienced performance issues on a desktop computer set to Performance Mode. I am currently working with a 32GB MacBook Pro, with 2.4 GHz Core i5 processor, 16 GB of RAM, 64 bit OS, 4GB NVIDIA Graphic card. Before using Photoshop, I was using Adobe Lightroom 5.3.2. It uses a LOT of RAM for previewing a lot of layers, it takes FULL CPU cores to preview for several minutes. I was editing 6 pictures, mostly using layers, with up to ~ 70 layers at the same time.
